The neurobiology of laparoscopy: laparoscopic surgery for the treatment of endometriosis. With the clinical application of laparoscopic surgery for the treatment of endometriosis, physicians will be called upon to investigate the neurobiology of laparoscopy. This report summarizes neurochemical changes in the brain in response to the onset of laparoscopic surgery in ovariectomized rats. The results of this study show that: the sham laparotomy did not cause changes in behavior in several reflexes; the ovariectomized rats, which are used as a model of endometriosis, exhibited some changes in behavior in the defensive burying test, the grooming test, and the hot plate test; and the onset of laparoscopic surgery resulted in marked changes in the behavior of ovariectomized rats in the defensive burying test and in the hot plate test. The data of this study suggest that laparoscopic surgery causes a decrease in the activity in the pain-sensitive areas in the brain, and the decrease in the activity in the pain-sensitive areas in the brain induced by the onset of laparoscopic surgery can be a potential mechanism for the decrease in the pain perception induced by the laparoscopic surgery. These results also suggest that laparoscopic surgery is a procedure that might be useful in the clinical treatment of endometriosis.

Amazing Interview with Ryan Carson of PixelPusher - kklein ===== moconnor Here's the talk - it's not very long but it's about as up front as you can get, and it's entertaining [First establishment of anaerobic methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus harboring Panton-Valentine leukocidin (pvl) in China. Staphylococcus aureus has emerged as a leading cause of healthcare-associated infections, especially among patients in intensive care units, a trend also observed for methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA). The vast majority of MRSA are community-associated, while reports of hospital-associated methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (HA-MRSA) have been increasing. Panton-Valentine leukocidin (pvl) is encoded by lukF-lukS, which is a unique secreted cytotoxin. It has been shown that pvl can increase the virulence of MRSA and has attracted attention in view of its role as an important virulence factor in community-associated MRSA (CA-MRSA). Here, we report the first isolate of pvl-producing MRSA in China. To understand the epidemiological and molecular epidemiology of pvl-producing MRSA, we analyzed their genotypes and carried out molecular analysis of spa typing, multilocus sequence typing (MLST), DNA microarray (SMART) and antibiotic resistance gene profiles. The results showed that this isolate belongs to sequence type (ST) 89 and also carried the mecA-pvl
