I'm curious if black jack with 21 is a zero sum game. I believe that it is because if you go over 21, it leaves you with a situation where you have $0/$$ and if you go under 21, it leaves you with $0/$$ and $21/$$ is it correct that I made this conclusion about? A: There are a number of things going on here. You're right that the rules of 21 make it a zero-sum game. However, there are also two "normal" rules that you can use in your game. These are called soft (or spoiled) 21 and blackjack. Soft 21 Soft 21 is also a zero-sum game, except that if you have $21$ you don't just get the original $21$, you also get the entire payoff table. Blackjack Blackjack is also a zero-sum game, but here the only winning hand is $0$. So to make a game that isn't zero-sum, you'd use normal rules for blackjack, with two exceptions. First, instead of soft 21, you'd have a "soft 21" which required you to get an Ace instead of $21$. Second, instead of blackjack being a zero-sum game, you'd make it a zero-sum game with an additional rule: you can only get $0$ if you have $0$. Now, all of these rules are zero-sum games, but that doesn't matter because you can choose to play one of them or a combination of them. In practice, most people don't change the rules very much, so the rules I described above are the main
