keymacro is a very simple, lightweight keyboard macro program. You enter a macro of your choice in a Windows editor-like text editor, which will be executed when pressing a hotkey of your choice. There is no additional configuration needed, and you can easily use it with any hotkey combination you want. Every keystroke and each selected word will be executed sequentially. You can modify the macro by adding or removing commands, or replace a text in the macro with another one. You can also choose to execute the last macro you entered or to use the last macro you've edited. The program's options panel allows you to choose how the macro will be triggered and also gives you the possibility to set the hotkey to which the program listens to the user. The macro editor has two modes of operation: Default mode or complete mode. In the Default mode the program automatically generates a macro for every selected text, in complete mode you must choose which text you want to be substituted with the macro in order to define the shortcut. To make this process easier you can use the right arrow key (backwards or forwards) to select the text you want to be substituted with the macro.

Once you've selected the text, use the down arrow key to choose what you want to replace it with. Another important aspect of the program is that it doesn't allow the user to select a text twice. Other features worth mentioning are a special key with which you can edit the line in which the macro is currently stored and a special option which allows you to hide/show the line in which the macro is stored by using the Alt key. Another useful feature is the ability to see the macro you've defined.
