70s, rock and roll flew off into a mist of nostalgia and trendiness and uninspired lyrics. I know that an entire decade was given over to pumping water (water! water!), usually a scene- or song-per-scene or album-per-scene style approach, e.g., Pier Pressure in 1976; Pipes of Peace at the same time; I Can't Tell You Why in 1977; and, in 1978, No Fun Aloud. And that many musicians of the 70s would leave too early with a bitter taste in their mouths. And that the sales of rock music plummeted in a mighty free fall. And that there would be "too much of a good thing." I know that people, and the music and the fashion of the 70s, made me want to ask the question: "Why did that great decade become such an ambivalent, unhappy thing?" There were a few reasons: rock and roll and its subculture was shifting away from street-level, middle class heroes like Steve Miller and Curtis Mayfield and Duane Allman to the talk-show circuit. Rock and roll was going after the big insecurities of the psychedelic hippies — conformity and alienation, short hair and long locks, Haight-Ashbury and U.S. Steel, James Brown and Neil Armstrong, Sun Ra and hair the color of high-level uranium. And, ironically, this danceable music was and is truly the most overt and honest of all. This was when rock and roll proved it could be both R&B and rock. But when Danny Weis, Davy Hutch, and I, meant to tackle this topic, we came up against a major difficulty: We all love the 70s music. We can hear it coming back right now. Backflips, Magnum
