More The Indian economy, which many forecasters consider a middle-income country, could still stand to be a lot more. The hope is that by 2019, the country's average wage will be more than three times higher than it is today, enabling it to join that elite club of countries with incomes on par with the U.S. Some say India's already started to chip away at the G-20 superpower's economic juggernaut. Private equity, though, has always been a way for the world's giants to succeed by investing in emerging markets. And with fewer U.S. capital markets on the table for them to tap, India has become a particularly good option. In the seven years since the Global Financial Crisis, the world has seen an "entirely new marketplace," said Curtis Saporta, managing partner of the Carlyle Group in India. Private equity has moved from countries with emerging economies with "underdeveloped" markets to emerging-market-focused private equity companies that focus on the regions where the majority of their revenues are coming from, Saporta told CNBC. Domestically, both Brookfield Asset Management and Blackstone Group have built a solid presence in India, as do other "sophisticated" investors, said Iqbal

Quadir, managing partner of DTZ India, a division of Ernst & Young, a leading international professional services firm. Additionally, he said, "the large and very successful" Indian banks have also moved into private equity. All those factors have left the Indian market ripe for private equity, he said. This has helped India turn into what is now being touted as the third-largest private equity market by value, behind the U.S. and U.K. Despite the surge of interest, just how big of a business the private equity market is in India is open to debate. Saporta estimates that there are around $60 billion invested in the market right now. "Right now, it's not very
