Once the POD procedures are performed, the state of these systems will be tested and assessed against our already established processes. This provides the ability to complete our POD procedure in a timely manner, without the delay of procurement of new equipment that may be necessary for a clinical service that we typically perform in theatre. This has been demonstrated with the use of our POD procedure in the setting of ORC. The exposure of the entire team to POD was another benefit of the model. The multidisciplinary team was required to consider both their patients and the care that they required and shouldered the responsibility of being part of the model. The surgical team was required to be cognisant of patient care and the family shouldering any added stress and anxiety from the new procedure. Many of the POD procedures occur on patients who are already unconscious and are in a vulnerable position during the procedure. This was a benefit of the POD model as the team had already established communication and rapport with the patient. This allowed for a streamlined and smooth transition between the OR and POD with reduced anxiety and stress for both the patient and family. As a tertiary referral unit, one of the challenges of our clinical practice is that many patients present late to an acute illness. Those that present with organ dysfunction may be deemed to have a suboptimal prognosis, resulting in many patients being deemed ineligible for a POD consultation. This becomes a source of great anxiety for family and the patient, as the patient is e79caf774b
