

The biggest changes in this year's iteration of FIFA come from the way players are moved around the pitch. With the introduction of this new technology, the team is implementing a new animation system, far more detailed than what was in the previous installments of the series. In previous games, characters were kind of awkward and unresponsive, especially in possession. To make up for the shortcoming of the previous generation of FIFA, this year's game is much more realistic in all aspects. According to the people in charge, FIFA 22 is the most realistic football game ever released. Much of this change is thanks to the development of HyperMotion, a motion capture technology that is fairly new in the industry. The technology was invented by Nevo Studios, and was first used in WWE 2K17 (released last year) and then in NBA 2K18, before the addition of the technology in FIFA. From Concept to Game When compared with the previous generation of FIFA, this year's model is much more sophisticated, much more detailed, and we're talking about visual fidelity rather than gameplay. However, I still saw a lot of improvements, and it is a lot better than previous editions of the game. The best part is that all these great and realistic innovations are from FIFA Community. If the whole game was improved, these are some of the features that should get a lot of praise. Run Up The run up is a really important part of the game. It is one of the main features that we care about the most during a match, and it is usually a result of how well you perform in the run up. This is the reason why this feature was chosen as one of the most important to improve in the game. In the FIFA Universe, players have a curve radius of 360 degrees that determines how fast they can run from any point on the pitch. In FIFA 18, they had the same rule for sprints and quick acceleration; and in FIFA 19, they removed this feature. But this feature has been taken back to the game in FIFA 22 with the introduction of the "Run Up" menu. We are introducing the Run Up menu in this way, as it's also a matter of realism for the player; and the idea is that the player, when it has reached the angle of 180 degrees, it will be able to run quickly. In real life, we don't stand still
