1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a surgical stapling apparatus. More particularly, the present invention relates to a surgical apparatus for transversely severing and anastomosing various layers of tissue in a patient.

2. Description of Related Art In performing many surgical procedures it is necessary for a surgeon to employ a linear cutting and stapling instrument such as a linear cutter/stapler having a single focal length which can be selectively changed to accommodate varying tissue thicknesses. The surgical instrument has a cartridge which must be loaded with staples or fasteners of a suitable size to be used for a particular procedure. In loading the cartridge, it is necessary to orient the fasteners in the distal end of the cartridge to produce a linear cut having a smooth interior surface. There are two basic methods for producing staples. According to one method, the staples are formed in rows using a punch and die assembly in which a metal blank is fitted over a staple holding die and then formed into the desired staples in a separate operation. According to the other method, the staples are punched from a continuous web of stock material which is accumulated on a supply roll. As the web is taken from the supply roll, a forming anvil nips the web and bends the sheet into an open U shape which defines a plurality of regularly spaced rows of staples in the sheet. A driver, at least one end of which is exposed, moves within the U-shaped portion of the staple and pushes the staples out of the staple holding portion of the staple holding die in a direction transverse to the staple feeding direction. It is desirable to produce a cutting and stapling apparatus that produces a very smooth cutting edge, as well as a staple holding portion which is smooth so as to prevent the staples from cutting into the surface of the tissue prior to formation. Further, it is desirable to maintain a uniform gap between the anvil and the driver blade throughout the range of positions of the blades relative to the staple holding portion
