The lower difficulty levels allow you to navigate the streets in an approachable fashion, while the higher levels allow the player to get more brutal. What's new in Riskers:

Rule October 21 Gone is the offseason in a year's time, replaced with the fever of preparation and anticipation of fall season. Today sees the last of my "preseason" articles, until the 11th of December. It makes sense to start the writing about what shapes up to be a pretty good year for the Riskies. Now in its fifth year, the riskiology leads towards its best season yet. What's interesting about this is that we had a bit of an unexpected jolt to the season when one of our longest-tenured Riskies made the decision to not continue with the Riskies team. As a result, we're pretty limited in how many games we can attend. In more ways than one. Here's a quick housekeeping item. As been the normal behaviour of the Riskies since the summer, we're not planning on attending the season-opener or the full chunk of regular season tilts. We'll be relegated to the "games we can't miss" rotation. We'll travel as scheduled to the following games, which is a small 16-game slate. We'll make up for the lost games plus pick up a few extra days of season action. All in all, it's at the low end of the season provided we make it to at least four games scheduled. 2017 Expansion It's quite possible that we pick up an additional team as the 2017 season opens. We will invite one of the fill-in parents with the best interest of the newest RISKYE at heart. Thus far, we've had Evan, Jessica and Andrea look promising, and we've gotten to know the other families who have stepped up with their own aspirations of RISKYE expansion. So long as one parent with the desired interest is willing to foot the bill at the start of the season and a team is willing to stick with us, we'll be in business. The question of where they'd go will be an interesting one, and therefore have a pretty real effect on our attendance, and schedule as a whole. Thanks to age restrictions and a couple of our players already being on teams, we're limited to eight RISKYE players on the pitch at any one time. The one with the most RISKYE hours (and much-earned respect) will be handed the reins
