HIV infection, in early stages, has a defined clinical behavior and can be considered a defect in the immune function. The investigator is determining if the assay which measures immune function at these early stages, the DC-10, can be used to predict the progress of HIV infection. The hypothesis is that the DC-10, in its many variations, will be able to identify those individuals at risk for disease progression. The term "neurodegenerative diseases" covers a large number of diseases characterized by the loss of neuronal and/or glial cells. This often leads to the progressive destruction of brain function that underlies the clinical symptoms. Alzheimer's disease

(AD), Parkinson's disease (PD), Huntington's disease (HD), and the various prion-related disorders are among the neurodegenerative diseases that affect human health and cost society greatly. The common cause for neurodegeneration is protein aggregation, which leads to the aberrant deposition of the aggregation-prone protein. These proteins share common features that make them prone to aggregation in the brain. First, in most cases, the size of the protein exceeds the range of structural barriers that exist in normal brain tissue. Second, in most cases, the protein is

Field of the Invention This invention relates to a process for producing particulate hollow polymer particles having an inner void, the surface of which is covered with a thin layer of a reactive functional group containing substance. 2. Description of the Prior Art Polymer particles have heretofore been produced by various methods, among which known are, for example, the emulsion polymerization method (disclosed, for example, in U.S. Pat. No. 2,919,891), and the suspension polymerization method (disclosed, for example, in U.S. Pat. No. 3,030,335 and U.S. Pat. No. 3,304,282). The emulsion polymerization method comprises the steps of emulsifying a monomer or monomers in an aqueous medium with the aid of an emulsifying agent and polymerizing the monomer or monomers in the aqueous medium, thereby producing spherical droplets. On the other hand, the suspension polymerization method comprises the steps of suspending solid fine polymer particles in an aqueous medium and polymerizing the monomer or monomers in the aqueous medium to produce spherical droplets. The aforesaid methods, however, have the disadvantage that the resulting particles have particle diameters of several microns and thus cannot be used for the production of fine powder, and in addition, the methods are disadvantageous, for example, in that the resultant particles are in the form of agglomerates. Various other methods for producing particulate polymer particles have heretofore been proposed, and they are described below. In one such method, there is used a particulate porous body of an organic polymer, for example, a salt-forming cellulose such as a carboxymethyl cellulose, hydroxyethyl cellulose, hydroxypropyl cellulose or the like, which has been obtained by mixing a powdery inorganic salt such
