I have seen a lot of ways to use retrofit. I am trying to learn through examples on android docs. My understanding is to get response from server I first need to make http call and then attach the response on retrofit in android. Question: When I make http call retrofit creates a POJO for me and I can attach my response. Is there any case where I can directly attach the xml to the request. My current understanding is I need to make http call first and then attach the xml to the retrofit. Am I correct? If yes, what is the use of retrofit. I have seen code on github where I am not necessary to make the call. I am not trying to use retrofit to make such an calls, so my question is just concerned with reading example code on Which is not giving anything related to my question. Here is the sample code for the api call: @POST("/me") Call getUser(@Header("X-Token") String token); A: To access the @Body from your retrofit Interface you have to make sure the method returns an Interface of your retrofit Interface. For example: @POST("/me") Call getUser(@Header("X-Token") String token); public interface LoginService { @POST("/me") Interface getUser(@Header("X-Token") String token); } And you can add the @Body like this: public interface LoginService { @POST("/me") Interface

I see a lot of references to "mysql_native_password". How to know if I should use mysql_native_password or mysql_native_password or mysql_native_password? Could anyone please suggest. Thanks. A: According to the MySQL Documentation, MySQL 5.1.30 and newer supports'mysql_old_password()' as a replacement for the'mysql_native_password()' function. MySQL 5.1.32 and newer supports'mysql_old_password()' as a replacement for the'mysql_native_password()' function. which means that mysql_native_password can be considered deprecated in favor of mysql_old_password. To be clear, you can use any of the 3. You should use the deprecated functions if possible. A: mysql_native_password should be used. From the MySQL Documentation: The mysql_native_password() function provides the same functionality as the PASSWORD() function in other SQL database products. To use this function, MySQL needs to know the hostname of the MySQL server for which to store the password. For this reason, the mysql_native_password() function should be used when the hostname is known, when a password cannot be set using a.cnf file for a remote host, when it is desirable to find out the password that has been set when it
