leicageoffice83crackYesterday I posted about my great experience with Yelp.com. My last review was a crazy long one about a nice place for dinner called Social Cafe. I really liked the place (there was a jazz concert going on as I was writing) but Yelp.com had their reviews really mixed. Apparently, some of Social Cafe's customers didn't love the place as much. Even though I loved their food, their service and even their desserts, it just didn't have a 5 star review, just a 3 star one. Oops. My post about Yelp got a reaction from someone named (to the best of my memory) Bill. He left the following comment: [url= Cafe: Letford, LE16 8BL - Letford, VA[/url] At first I didn't realize the url had changed to that one. When I saw it, I was shocked. YUCK! He put my review in a bad light, even though I tried to explain about what he had done. He also left a comment on this blog of mine. Bill, I think we had a difference of opinion. I don't think I was trying to belittle you. My post was about my experience with Yelp. I was not criticizing the restaurant. It was a great place, I enjoyed it very much. I just wanted to share my opinion. At first I didn't know what to do. But then I went to the URL and saw the review where Bill had left his own review and then commented, instead of the original review that I had left. It's really uncalled for and I don't think it's at all appropriate. It's on my blog and on Google. I can't delete the original review I wrote about the place, but I did delete the comment he wrote under it. For me, that was good enough. The problem seems to be that
