Monthly Archives: May 2011 The results are in, and with them the disappointment. After all, a Canadian geologist has been elected president of the United States of America. The fossilized bones of an animal unearthed at a North Dakota site known as Dinosaur Provincial Park are bone dry as the result of what local paleontologists believe to be a dry spell in a period roughly 10 million years ago. The bones in question may not belong to dinosaurs at all, but they're massive, and they suggest something pretty huge. There's a high probability, the researchers report in Science, that the bones belong to a large, long-necked sauropod that was the size of a Volkswagen Beetle. This is important: a giant lagerstaaap! The evolutionary significance of the find is a little more complex. At first blush, the find appears to confirm the long-standing idea that not all dinosaurs were scrawny lizards (although some certainly were); that is, there may have been one, or perhaps even many, species of sauropods, which had varying sizes and lengths of necks. The find suggests that the dinosaur that lived here was shaped like a turkey. Paleontologists aren't sure what its scientific name ought to be, so they're calling it a Laura. Note the well-studied relationship between bolinas+and bolinas, now made real by the discovery of the most interesting place in the world. Using the new geological information, this comparison is even more compelling. Here is the clockwise time table. Welcome, Members of the Congregation of the Sisters of Mercy! When we think of "mercy" today, we can be assured that the sisters of the Congregation of the Sisters of Mercy do not just think about their own lives. They think about the people they encounter and try to help them in any way. Their main focus, however, is on God's mercy in saving them from their sin. Today, we look to the Sisters of Mercy to help us remember that it
