The present invention relates generally to a circuit for reducing the flow of current through a filter capacitor. More particularly, the present invention relates to a circuit for reducing the initial current flow through a filter capacitor coupled between an input and an output of a DC-to-DC converter. Digital to analog converters are used to convert a digital signal to an analog signal. Such converters are used in various types of electronic equipment such as computers, calculators, and facsimile machines. One technique for converting a digital signal to an analog signal utilizes a switched capacitor. A switched capacitor DC-to-DC converter includes a filter capacitor for filtering any alternating current that may flow in the output of the converter. The filter capacitor is typically charged during a first time period when an input voltage is low and decoupled during a second time period when the input voltage is high. Accordingly, when the input voltage is again low, the filter capacitor is again charged for a subsequent clock cycle. In a typical application, the filter capacitor may have a maximum charge of several hundred milliamps. The use of switched capacitor converters has generally been limited to low-current applications. A problem arises, however, when an input to a switched capacitor DC-to-DC converter is applied directly to an input of a microprocessor. A problem arises during the start-up of a microprocessor. When an input voltage is initially applied to a microprocessor to begin execution of microprocessor instructions, a high current pulse is initially applied to the input of the microprocessor. The current pulse may be on the order of several hundred milliamps in a matter of milliseconds. The high current pulse to the microprocessor can be detrimental to an internal storage capacitor of the microprocessor. The high current pulse may damage the internal storage capacitor and, thus, may prevent proper execution of the instructions of the microprocessor. Accordingly

Darwin's Tennis Balls: By Darwin May 2011 I've read a lot deal of posts and blogs on this topic (including from Darwin himself) but the following information is new and doesn't appear to be anywhere I could find: Darwin's online website, www.darwinsperfecttennisball.com has been updated. See for the details, and our press release, at Darwin's tennis balls (or a tennis ball made from Darwin's materials) can be made from many of the following materials, though I can only recommend materials which are completely inert, for biological reasons (mind you, dogs have been walking with tennis balls for over a century but I don't see that phenomenon promoted). - White ExKast® - literally white plastic (like a tennis ball) - The old white Q-Ball is still good. - Outdated Kraton Kingite is good. - Dog tennis balls - made from rubber core with a mohair outer layer can generally be used with rackets. - Heavy duty Bont, slightly off white - not a good choice as they do change color. - Heavy duty Q-balls - very slightly bluish in color, but can be used. It will be interesting to track down an older racket that had white markings on it. I have some of my old tennis rackets, but I'll have to
