Post-SCI pathophysiology includes early (immediate) and delayed (chronic) pathophysiological responses that precipitate secondary injury, manifest as the progressive loss of function of the injured axons. Currently, there are no effective neuroprotective agents that slow the progression of secondary injury. One way of preventing progression of secondary injury is through neuroprotection, i.e. maintenance of neurons, including preservation of axons, at a level that enables them to maintain functional integrity. This is possible through selective neuroprotective agents that provide a limited benefit to the patient's own neurons while sparing the unaffected neurons. Recent advances in stem cell research have paved the way for novel cell-based therapies to accelerate axonal regeneration and functional recovery after SCI. In particular, mesenchymal stem cell (MSC) transplantation has demonstrated beneficial effects in animal studies. MSCs are multipotent progenitor cells, which are able to differentiate into chondrocytes, osteoblasts and adipocytes and are able to facilitate regeneration of damaged spinal cord tissues. Unlike embryonic stem cells, MSCs are relatively non-tumorigenic and immunomodulatory, thus eliminating
